

WHEN COMMUNICATION CAUSES FRUSTRATION

At times, many children show frustration when they are learning language. Children with speech and/or language delays may find it especially challenging to express ideas, share information, recount an event or retell a story. These tips will help you help your child communicate with others and deal with frustration successfully.

When a child has difficulty speaking:

- Be patient. Get down to your child's level when communicating.
- Repeat and clarify what you think he is saying. This helps him know you understood and are listening.
- Ask "yes/no" questions or simple "wh" questions (e.g. "You want to make a card?" "Who is it for?").
- Ask her to show you when don't understand. She can point, show you the object or make an action.
- Imitate and repeat sounds, words and sentences that your child says – but always give them a better model (e.g. If he says: "me see tat", say "You see a cat").
- Interpret your child's attempts to communicate – give meaning to a gesture, a sound, incomplete words or part of a sentence. Repeat it back. (e.g. "You're pointing at the banana. You want the banana.")
- Teach your child control words such as "no", "stop", "wait", "my turn", "me too". If your child can't say these words, help her communicate through gestures, signs, symbols or photographs.
- When playing with other children, tell them that your child is trying to be their friend. Stay nearby to help him get his message across and resolve problems.

When a child has difficulty understanding:

- Use short, simple sentences – they are easier for your child to understand.
- Repeat often. Repeat important words.
- When a message is long, repeat it again but break it into smaller units (e.g. When we go to the store, we will buy a book. Breakdown – "Let's go to the store. We'll buy a book.")
- Slow down when you speak. Pause often. This helps your child think about what you are saying when you go slow.
- Show as you speak: use gestures, pointing, actions, and pictures or hold up objects to help your child understand your message.
- Talk with your child about frustration. Name what your child is feeling - for example "You are angry. I'm sorry. Can you show me/tell me again?"

Even if your child is having trouble communicating thoughts and feelings, you still need to set rules about expressing frustration. Be sure your child knows the rules ahead of time. Praise your child when he deals with frustration successfully.

For more information visit www.onekidsplace.ca